Employers struggle to keep up with the ever-increasing amount of regulations, ranging from discrimination and harassment laws statewide, to local leave laws. This ensures that the client implements practical solutions which are compliant and efficient, and allows the employer to focus on what's most important to them—their business.

Meredith is an innovative litigator whose practice focuses on complex employment litigation, defending management against claims of discrimination, harassment, and retaliation under federal, state, and city laws, single-plaintiff, and class and collective action claims brought under wage-and-hour laws. In particular, Meredith has experience advising clients on compliance with payroll debit card laws and other wage-and-hour laws, workplace privacy matters, and leave laws.

This dual perspective of working on litigation and counseling matters for her clients allows Meredith to see how proactive compliance can prevent possible litigation. As a result, she has gained a deep understanding of substantive legal matters to allow her to most aggressively and strategically litigate cases.

Meredith's passion for employment law began in law school, where she was editor-in chief of the Hofstra Labor & Employment Law Journal. She earned an MBA at the same time as her law degree. This combination gives her insight into her clients' businesses, as well as their legal concerns.

Working at Seyfarth gives Meredith the opportunity to represent large and small employers alike, while deploying the most creative, innovative, and cutting-edge strategies and tools on their behalf.
